Herbert Spencer, 1820-1903

Spencer's theory of evolution was based on the idea of natural selection. He argued that organisms that were better adapted to their environment would survive and reproduce, while those that were not would die out. This process, he believed, led to the gradual development of new species over time.

Spencer's theory of evolution was controversial at the time, but it laid the foundation for modern evolutionary biology. His ideas were later expanded upon by Charles Darwin and other scientists.
